that we can read by "being there" that provides greater understanding and empathy and exultation. Lack of resolution in co-speech gesturing is but one of many deficiencies of inferior online learning. For some teachers whose "teacher's voice" is too soft, some are using a headset microphone outside the mask. Teachers are discovering they need to have several masks in order to change out when one gets wet. Speaking through a mask can also cause dehydration; teachers learn to step out to drop the mask to take a drink. For those students that must study from home, the fiasco of this last spring has clearly shown that anytime-anywhere asynchronous learning is abysmal. Those who taught during the 1970s experiment with the much hyped television education know it failed miserably. Today's teachers know that only "live screen time" or being "together" online with the teacher in real time is a little more engaging. But it is nowhere as good as being physically present in class. For those students watching a screen at home, "Zoom fatigue" has become a major limitation. Honest teachers clearly recognize that the attention span on a screen is limited and far less than engagement in a real classroom. And it is the hugs that young elementary students miss. That is hard to simulate. Cardboard cut-out "fake hands" or waving to friends from a distance just isn't the same. But K-12 teachers are "in loco parentis" or function "in the place of the parent" and have a jurisdiction over students. Universities have less jurisdiction over their students, especially off-campus. However, many college students are aware that their safety depends on their classmates not participating in high risk behaviors. Off-campus beer parties are becoming a source of asymptomatic transmission. While the risk of serious COVID-19 infection is less the younger the student, hospitalizations occur and in turn endanger healthcare workers both young and old. And non-traditional students coming back for advanced degrees are older and more at-risk. So some college students who are alert to these dangerous behaviors are "virus snitching" on their irresponsible classmates. And that is a good thing.
